INTRODUCTION

Film making is a creative form of visual storytelling that combines acting, cinematography, lighting, sound and editing to communicate ideas and emotions to an audience. A short film presents a complete story within a limited duration, so its characters, events and message must be clear and every scene must serve a purpose. Even a simple incident can become a powerful film when it is presented with proper planning, believable performances and careful editing.

Radio podcasting communicates stories through audio elements such as narration, dialogue, music, sound effects and silence. Since the audience cannot see anything, the listener must imagine the characters, places and actions through sound alone. Both forms require creativity, planning and effective storytelling, but each one uses different tools to reach the audience.

The project titled “THE PHONE” is a short social-drama film directed by Shiva Subramaniyan V as part of the Film Making and Radio Podcasting course. The story is about a misunderstanding. Sri Vishnu loses his phone to a thief riding a scooty. Later, when he sees Aadhi with a phone and the same scooty, he assumes Aadhi is responsible and accuses him without knowing the full truth.

The story is resolved through a police call, which reveals that the actual thief is Shiva, Aadhi’s friend, who is never shown on screen. Vishnu realizes his mistake and apologizes. The film explores how appearances and incomplete information can lead to unfair assumptions, a situation that many people can recognize from everyday life. It reminds the audience that a quick judgment can hurt an innocent person.

The project is designed not only as a visual short film but also as a story that can be adapted into a radio podcast. In the podcast version, the visual elements are replaced by narration, dialogue and sound effects, so that the same message reaches the audience through sound alone. This report documents the story idea, characters, scenes and the film-making and podcasting techniques planned for the project.

PROJECT OVERVIEW

The main idea of THE PHONE is to show how quickly a person can be wrongly accused when a decision is made on incomplete information. The film takes a very common situation, the theft of a mobile phone, and uses it to show how anger and suspicion can make a person ignore the facts. The story is simple, but the message is meaningful and easy for every viewer to understand.

The film follows Sri Vishnu, who walks along a street while scrolling through Instagram. A person on a scooty suddenly snatches his phone and rides away. Vishnu runs after the thief, slips and falls, then shouts for his phone as the thief escapes. This opening establishes the loss that drives the rest of the story.

In a park, Aadhi tells a friend that he has sent money to help the friend's father receive hospital treatment. A call interrupts their conversation, and Aadhi leaves while speaking on the phone. Later, Vishnu asks Aadhi for a lift. Aadhi gives him a ride and drops him off without any problem between them.

After the drop-off, Vishnu hears his phone ringtone and sees Aadhi leaving on the scooty. He assumes Aadhi is the thief, chases him and demands his phone. Aadhi explains that the phone and scooty belong to his friend. Vishnu calls the police and learns that the thief they caught is Shiva. Aadhi confirms that Shiva is his friend, and Vishnu apologizes for the mistaken accusation.

The project also gives the team an opportunity to practice planning. Because the events happen in a few locations and involve only a few characters, the team can focus on performance, framing and sound instead of managing a large production.

The film uses a small cast, accessible outdoor locations and easily available objects such as a mobile phone and a scooty. This makes the project practical to produce while still allowing different film-making techniques such as camera framing, sound design and editing to be demonstrated clearly.

TITLE – THE PHONE

The title “THE PHONE” is simple, and it directly points to the object at the center of the story. The phone is the first thing that is lost, the clue that causes the misunderstanding, and the proof that finally clears the confusion. Every important event in the film is connected to it, so the title tells the audience where to look.

At the beginning, the phone is a normal part of Vishnu’s life, and he is using it to scroll through Instagram when it is snatched. Its loss creates his anger and the need to find the thief. Later, the ringtone of the same phone becomes the strongest clue in the story, and it makes Vishnu believe that Aadhi is the thief. A single object therefore moves the story from the theft to the accusation.

The message of the film is “Don’t Judge a Book by Its Cover.” It is not used as the title because the film wants the audience to discover this idea through the story instead of being told in advance. Vishnu sees Aadhi with a phone and a scooty and quickly connects him to the theft. These are only outward appearances, and his assumption is incorrect.

The message becomes meaningful when the police reveal that the actual thief is Shiva and that Aadhi is only Shiva’s friend. The earlier park scene, where Aadhi speaks about helping a friend’s father with hospital treatment, shows that he is a caring person. The audience therefore understands how unfair the accusation was.

The proverb also connects with the way people behave in daily life. Many people form opinions about others within seconds, based on clothes, vehicles, belongings or the situation in which they are seen. The film shows that such opinions can be dangerous, because they may cause an innocent person to suffer embarrassment and anger.

By combining a simple title with a strong message, the film leaves the audience with a question that stays with them: how often do we judge without knowing the truth? The ending encourages viewers to seek facts and understand others before making accusations, and the final message repeats the lesson so that it stays in their minds.

GENRE

The film belongs to the social drama genre, with elements of everyday-life drama and misunderstanding. The phone-snatching incident creates urgency, while the later confrontation introduces conflict based on mistaken identity. The story is close to real life, so the audience can easily connect with the characters and their reactions.

The story builds interest through a relatable situation and the gradual arrival of information that corrects Vishnu's assumption. The audience receives the clues at the same time as the main character, which helps them understand why he reaches the wrong conclusion. Unlike a thriller, the film does not depend on fear; it depends on a familiar human mistake.

The emotional tone changes as the story moves forward. It begins with a relaxed street scene, becomes tense during the theft and chase, turns warm in the park conversation, and becomes sharp during the accusation. The final apology brings the story to a calm and thoughtful ending.

The major dramatic elements used in the film are:

- The phone snatching
- The chase
- The park conversation
- The lift
- The mistaken accusation
- The police confirmation
- The apology

The film also uses situational conflict rather than a villain. Vishnu and Aadhi are both ordinary people, and the conflict arises only because of a wrong assumption. This makes the drama more realistic and allows the audience to feel sympathy for both characters at different moments in the story. Because the genre is realistic, the film avoids exaggerated acting, unnatural dialogue and unnecessary effects.

OBJECTIVES

The main objective of the project is to create a short, understandable film that communicates the importance of avoiding judgments based on incomplete information. The project also aims to demonstrate how camera work, lighting, editing and sound can be combined to create a realistic atmosphere and a clear emotional response from the audience.

The specific objectives are:

- To develop an original short-film story.
- To practice screenplay writing and scene development.
- To present believable character actions and reactions.
- To use camera framing to communicate movement and conflict.
- To apply lighting, editing and sound to support a realistic atmosphere.
- To adapt the story into a radio podcast.
- To understand the difference between visual and audio storytelling.
- To demonstrate the value of empathy and checking facts before accusing someone.

Another important objective is to understand teamwork in a production. A short film requires coordination between the director, the actors, the person handling the camera and the person handling sound and editing. By working together, the team learns how each role contributes to the final result.

The project also aims to develop the habit of planning before shooting. Preparing a scene list, a shot list and a list of props helps to save time and avoid mistakes. This preparation is an important part of professional film making, even for a small student project.

These objectives make the project both creative and educational. The film gives practical experience in planning and shooting a story, while the message of the film encourages viewers to think carefully before blaming others. The podcast adaptation adds a second objective by showing how one story can be told in two different media.

STORY DEVELOPMENT

The story was developed from a familiar incident: a person loses a phone to a snatcher and later mistakes another person for the thief. This creates a straightforward conflict that can be filmed with a small cast and accessible outdoor locations. The idea was chosen because it is realistic and because many viewers have seen or experienced a similar situation.

The opening establishes Vishnu's loss and frustration. The story then shifts to Aadhi, whose conversation about helping a friend's father provides context about his character. This scene is important because it shows the audience that Aadhi is kind and responsible before Vishnu accuses him. The lift connects the two characters naturally.

The ringtone and the scooty lead Vishnu to suspect Aadhi, although he does not know the full situation. These two clues were selected because they are simple, visible and audible, and they are strong enough to make the misunderstanding believable. The audience can follow Vishnu's thinking even though they know he may be wrong.

The police confirmation becomes the turning point. Shiva remains an off-screen character, identified only through dialogue, which allows the film to focus on Vishnu and Aadhi. Keeping the real thief unseen also keeps attention on the theme of the story rather than on the crime.

The character of Vishnu was designed to represent an ordinary person who becomes emotional after a loss. He is not a villain, and his mistake is understandable. This allows the audience to think about how they might behave in the same situation.

The character of Aadhi was designed as a contrast. He is calm, helpful and honest, and he does not react with anger when he is accused. His behavior makes the story more balanced and adds a positive quality to the film.

The idea was kept simple on purpose. A single misunderstanding, two main characters and two locations make the story easy to follow, and they allow the message to stay clear until the final scene. The simple structure also makes the story practical for a student production.

STORY SYNOPSIS

Sri Vishnu walks along a street while scrolling through Instagram. He is relaxed and not paying attention to his surroundings. A thief on a scooty suddenly snatches his phone and speeds away. Vishnu runs after him, slips and falls, then shouts at the thief to return his phone. The thief escapes, leaving Vishnu angry and helpless.

In a park, Aadhi tells a friend that he has sent money to support the hospital treatment of the friend's father. A phone call arrives, and Aadhi leaves while talking. Later, Vishnu meets Aadhi, asks him for a lift, and Aadhi agrees. He drops Vishnu at his destination, and the two part without any problem.

As Aadhi rides away, Vishnu hears his own phone ringtone and sees Aadhi with the scooty. Believing Aadhi is the thief, Vishnu chases him, stops him and demands his phone. Aadhi is surprised and denies stealing it. He explains that the phone and the scooty belong to his friend.

Vishnu does not fully believe him and calls the police. During the call, he learns that the actual thief has been caught and is named Shiva. He turns to Aadhi and asks whether he knows Shiva. Aadhi confirms that Shiva is his friend.

Vishnu realizes that he judged Aadhi only by the phone and the scooty. He understands his mistake and apologizes for the false accusation. The film ends with the message: "Don't Judge a Book by Its Cover."

Through this sequence, the film shows how a small clue can lead to a wrong conclusion. The ringtone and the scooty are real clues, but they do not prove that Aadhi is the thief. Only the police call provides the complete truth, and it changes the meaning of everything that Vishnu believed a few minutes earlier.

The story is simple, but every part is connected. The theft creates the problem, the park scene explains Aadhi's nature, the lift connects the characters and the police call solves the confusion. The final apology gives the film a clear and positive ending.

CHARACTERS

Sri Vishnu (Character 1) is the central character of the film. He is first shown as a relaxed young person using Instagram while walking along the street. When his phone is snatched, he reacts with shock and anger and runs after the thief, even though he slips and falls. His frustration continues after the theft, and this emotional state makes him quick to suspect the first person who seems connected to the incident.

When he hears his ringtone and sees Aadhi on the scooty, Vishnu acts without thinking and accuses him. His character is not shown as cruel; he is shown as a person who reacts emotionally. His apology at the end shows that he can recognize his mistake and accept responsibility, which gives his character a positive change.

Aadhi (Character 2) is introduced in a park while discussing the money he sent to help his friend's father receive hospital treatment. This shows that he is helpful and caring. He later gives Vishnu a lift and is wrongly accused of theft. He explains calmly that the phone and scooty belong to his friend. His composed behavior contrasts with Vishnu's anger.

The contrast between the two main characters is the emotional center of the film. Vishnu represents a quick reaction based on emotion, while Aadhi represents patience and honesty. The audience sees both characters as ordinary people, and this makes the misunderstanding believable.

The performances should be natural and restrained. Vishnu's anger should increase step by step from the theft to the accusation, and Aadhi's surprise should look real rather than exaggerated. Small expressions, such as a pause before answering or a change in the eyes, can communicate more than long dialogue.

Shiva (Character 3) is a referenced character. He is Aadhi's friend and the actual phone snatcher. He does not appear on screen. His identity is revealed only when the police tell Vishnu that the thief they caught is named Shiva. Keeping him off screen allows the film to focus on the misunderstanding between Vishnu and Aadhi.

SCENE DEVELOPMENT

9.1 Scene 1 – Street

Vishnu walks along a street while scrolling through Instagram. A wide or medium shot establishes the public setting and his ordinary activity. The purpose of this scene is to introduce the main character and show a normal, relaxed situation before the incident. The audience should feel that nothing unusual is about to happen.

The camera can stay at a comfortable distance and show the surroundings, including the road and the people around, so that the audience understands where the story begins. Natural street sound and calm background activity can support the ordinary mood. Vishnu's attention on his phone should be clear, because it explains why he does not notice the danger.

9.2 Scene 2 – Phone Snatching

A thief riding a scooty approaches, snatches Vishnu's phone and rides away. The action should be brief and visually clear so that the audience understands exactly what has happened. A close-up of the phone leaving Vishnu's hand and the sound of the scooty engine can make the moment sudden and realistic.

The scene should not last long. The suddenness of the act helps the audience feel the same shock as Vishnu, and the thief's face need not be shown clearly so that the audience does not learn the identity too early. The sound of the engine should rise quickly and then move away.

9.3 Scene 3 – The Chase

Vishnu runs after the thief but slips and falls. He shouts for the thief to return his phone, but the thief escapes. This scene establishes Vishnu's loss and frustration. The camera can follow him closely during the run and then stay on his face after the fall to show his helplessness.

The fall should be staged safely with rehearsal. Vishnu's shout can be loud and emotional, and the sound of the scooty moving away can slowly reduce to show that the chance to catch the thief is lost. A short moment of silence after the sound fades can show how helpless he feels.

9.4 Scene 4 – Park Conversation

Aadhi speaks with a friend in a park and explains that he sent money to help the friend's father with hospital treatment. The conversation should be natural and calm. This scene provides context about Aadhi's character and shows him as a caring person, which makes the later accusation feel unfair.

A stable two-shot can be used to keep the friends together in the frame, and soft park sounds such as birds and distant voices can be added. The dialogue should be simple and sincere, and the friend's reaction can show gratitude so that the audience feels Aadhi's kindness.

9.5 Scene 5 – Aadhi's Call

Aadhi receives a call, answers it and leaves the park while continuing the conversation. The call acts as a transition and prepares the connection between the two characters. The audience does not hear the full call, so the small mystery remains. The sound of the ringtone marks the interruption clearly.

The camera can follow Aadhi for a few steps and then let him walk out of the frame. His tone should be casual, so that nothing about the call looks suspicious at this stage.

9.6 Scene 6 – Asking for a Lift

Vishnu asks Aadhi for a lift. Aadhi agrees and drops him at his destination. The lift brings the two characters together naturally. Their behavior is friendly, which makes the next scene more surprising. The ride can be shown with a short shot of the scooty moving along the road.

A medium shot of the two characters on the scooty and a short exchange of words are enough to show that they are comfortable with each other. At the drop-off, Vishnu thanks Aadhi and walks away, and the audience feels that the problem is over.

9.7 Scene 7 – The Ringtone

After Aadhi rides away, Vishnu hears his own phone ringtone and sees Aadhi with the scooty. He assumes Aadhi has his stolen phone. This is the moment where the misunderstanding begins. A close-up on Vishnu's face can show the change from confusion to anger.

The ringtone must be recognizable so that the audience also connects it with Vishnu's stolen phone. The same scooty should appear clearly in the frame. Vishnu's quick decision to chase Aadhi shows how easily emotion can replace careful thinking.

9.8 Scene 8 – Confrontation

Vishnu chases and stops Aadhi, demanding his phone. Aadhi denies the accusation and explains that the phone and scooty belong to his friend. The scene depends on dialogue and reactions, so the sound must remain clear.

Aadhi's calm reaction is important because it shows that he has nothing to hide, while Vishnu's tone becomes louder and more aggressive. Close-ups and over-the-shoulder shots can show the change in emotion. The scene should end with a moment of uncertainty, so that the audience wonders what will prove the truth.

9.9 Scene 9 – Police Call

Vishnu calls the police. They inform him that the actual thief has been caught and is named Shiva. The name should be spoken clearly so that the audience understands the turning point of the story.

A close-up of Vishnu listening to the call can show his expression changing from anger to shock. The pause after the name is important. Aadhi can stand nearby, and his reaction to the name Shiva can give the audience a hint before Vishnu asks the question.

9.10 Scene 10 – Truth and Apology

Vishnu asks Aadhi about Shiva. Aadhi confirms that Shiva is his friend. Vishnu understands his error and apologizes. The closing message presents the theme. A slow reaction shot on Vishnu's face can show his guilt, and the film can hold briefly on Aadhi's response before the closing message appears on screen. The closing message should stay on the screen long enough to be read comfortably, so that the audience can connect the story with its message and leave with the lesson of the film. The last frame can return to the phone in Vishnu's hand, showing that the object is the same but his understanding has changed.

CLIMAX AND ENDING

The climax occurs when Vishnu calls the police and learns that the actual thief has been caught. Until this moment, Vishnu is still convinced that Aadhi is guilty, and the tension between the two characters is at its highest point. The call changes the direction of the story completely because the truth arrives from an outside source.

The name Shiva leads Vishnu to ask Aadhi whether he knows him. Aadhi's answer clarifies the connection and corrects Vishnu's assumption. The audience now understands why Aadhi had the phone and the scooty with him, and the earlier clues that looked suspicious now have a simple explanation.

The ending resolves the misunderstanding through Vishnu's apology. The film closes on accountability and the importance of not making accusations without sufficient information. The final message is shown after the apology so that the audience can connect the story with its message.

The climax is also the point where the theme becomes clear. Until the police call, the audience is watching a conflict between two people. After the call, they realize that the conflict was created by a wrong assumption, and the film shows how easily this can happen.

Visually, the climax can be supported by a close-up of Vishnu's face during the call and a reaction shot of Aadhi standing quietly beside him. The pause after the name Shiva is important, because it gives the audience time to understand the truth at the same moment as Vishnu.

Vishnu's apology should be simple and honest. He does not need a long speech; a few sincere words are enough to show that he understands his mistake. Aadhi's response can be calm and forgiving, which reflects his character throughout the film.

CINEMATOGRAPHY

Cinematography is used to control how the audience sees the story. Wide shots can establish the street and the park, while medium shots can capture conversations and movement. Close-ups can show Vishnu's reaction after the theft, the phone and his expression during the confrontation. Each shot should have a clear purpose so that the audience always knows where to look.

Controlled tracking or handheld movement may communicate urgency during the chase. Stable two-shots and over-the-shoulder shots can support the park conversation and the confrontation. Reaction shots during the reveal and apology can show Vishnu's realization and Aadhi's calm response.

Consistent screen direction will help maintain continuity, especially during the chase and the second confrontation, so that the audience always understands who is moving and where. Camera movement should be simple and should not distract from the performances or the message.

The opening shots should be steady and wide so that the audience feels the calm of the street before the theft. When the phone is snatched, the camera can move slightly closer to show the speed of the event. During the chase, a low or tracking angle can increase the feeling of movement, and after the fall a close-up can show Vishnu's frustration.

In the park scene, longer and steadier shots can be used to give a peaceful feeling. During the confrontation, over-the-shoulder shots can show the direct conflict between Vishnu and Aadhi, while close-ups can show the emotion in their faces. The final apology can be recorded with a medium shot so that both characters are visible together.

The camera should also respect the emotional changes of the story. Calm and steady framing can be used in the park, while shorter and more active shots can be used during the theft and accusation. This gives the film a natural rhythm without requiring any complicated equipment.

LIGHTING

Lighting supports the realistic mood of the film. Natural daylight can provide a realistic look for the street and park scenes. The opening action should be sufficiently lit so that the phone snatching and chase are clearly visible. Soft natural light can support the calm park conversation.

Lighting and camera exposure should remain consistent across shots in the same scene. The visual approach should support the everyday setting rather than create an artificial dramatic mood, because the story is about an ordinary situation. Bright light also helps the audience see facial expressions clearly.

Since the film is shot outdoors, the time of the day should be chosen carefully. Early morning or late afternoon light is softer and avoids harsh shadows on the actors' faces. If clouds or sunlight change during shooting, the shots should be arranged so that the difference is not noticeable in the final edit.

Different scenes may need slightly different lighting treatment even though the overall look remains natural. The street scenes should look bright and open, because the theft happens in an ordinary public place. The park scene can use gentle shade and soft light, which supports the calm conversation.

For the confrontation and the police call, the light should not become dramatic, but the actors' faces must remain clearly visible so that the audience can read their emotions. Backlight should be avoided when it makes the faces too dark.

Lighting also supports continuity. If one shot is bright and the next shot in the same scene is dark, the audience may notice the difference. Therefore, the team should record scenes in the same time period and check the exposure before each take.

SOUND DESIGN

Sound design communicates the phone snatching, scooty movement and emotional changes. Street and park ambience establish the locations. Dialogue must remain clear, particularly Aadhi’s explanation and the police call.

The ringtone is especially important because it triggers Vishnu’s suspicion. Music should be subtle and should be used only during the reveal and apology so that it does not disturb the natural feeling of the scenes. Even small sounds such as footsteps and breathing after the chase can add realism.

Important sound elements include:

- Street ambience and footsteps
- Scooty engine
- Phone-snatching accent
- Vishnu’s shout and fall sound
- Park ambience and conversation
- Mobile ringtone and call audio
- Movement during the lift
- Confrontation dialogue
- Police-call voice
- Subtle music during the reveal and apology

Sound also helps the audience understand emotion. A sudden loud engine sound can create surprise during the theft, while soft ambience in the park can create calmness. After the police reveal, a brief pause in sound gives the audience time to react to the truth before the apology begins.

Sound levels should be balanced so that the dialogue is always understandable, even when traffic or wind is present in the background.

EDITING TECHNIQUES

Editing should preserve the sequence of events and make the misunderstanding understandable. Continuity editing can connect the theft, chase, park conversation, lift and confrontation. Short cuts can add urgency to the chase, while longer takes can support dialogue scenes.

Reaction shots can emphasize Vishnu’s suspicion and later realization. The ringtone can act as a sound bridge between scenes, so that the audience hears the clue before they understand its meaning. The police dialogue should clearly reveal the name Shiva. The ending can hold briefly on the apology or the final message before fading out.

The pace of editing should change with the story: quick during the theft and chase, slower during the park conversation, and steady during the final apology. This change in pace helps the audience feel the emotional movement of the film without needing any additional explanation.

The first part of the film should be edited to make the theft and chase easy to follow. The shot of the scooty approaching, the snatching action and the escape should be arranged in a clear order so that the audience does not miss any detail. A few quick cuts can show the chase without making the scene too long.

The park conversation and the lift should be edited at a calmer pace. Cutaways to Aadhi’s face, the scooty and the road can help the transition from one scene to another. The ringtone can be started slightly before the picture changes, so that the audience hears the clue and then sees Vishnu’s reaction.

In the final part, the editor should give importance to timing. A short pause after the police reveal, a slow cut to Vishnu’s reaction and a gentle fade after the closing message can make the ending more effective. Color correction and sound mixing should be done at the end so that all shots look and sound consistent.

USE OF PROPS AND LOCATION

The project is designed to be produced using accessible locations and easily available props. The main locations are a street for the phone-snatching and lift sequences, and a park for Aadhi's conversation. Both locations are common places, so they help the audience believe the story.

The major props required are:

- Mobile phone representing Vishnu's stolen phone
- Scooty used in the snatching and lift sequences
- Mobile phone for Aadhi, if separate
- Everyday clothing
- Park bench or seating
- Safe, controlled outdoor filming area

The phone and scooty should remain visually consistent so the audience understands Vishnu's assumption. The chase and fall should be staged safely using rehearsal, camera angles and editing.

The street location should have enough space for the scooty to move safely and for the camera to be placed without blocking traffic. A quiet road with low traffic is suitable for the theft, chase and lift. The park should have a bench or open area where two characters can sit or stand and talk comfortably.

Props should be arranged before shooting and checked after every scene. The phone used by Vishnu should look the same in all shots, and the scooty should have the same color and visible features throughout the film. Small details like these help the audience follow the story without confusion.

RADIO PODCAST ADAPTATION

The same story can be adapted into a radio podcast by replacing visual actions with narration, dialogue and sound effects. The narrator can describe Vishnu walking and using Instagram, while street ambience and a scooty engine establish the setting. The listener must be able to imagine the street, the park and the scooty only through sound.

The phone snatching, chase and fall can be communicated through sound and Vishnu's dialogue. Aadhi's park conversation reveals his helpful nature. The ringtone becomes an audio clue when Vishnu suspects Aadhi. The police call delivers the reveal, followed by the apology and the closing message. This demonstrates the importance of sound imagination in radio storytelling.

Some visual details in the film cannot be seen in a podcast, so they must be described briefly by the narrator or shown through sound. For example, the sight of Aadhi on the scooty can be presented through the sound of the engine and Vishnu's reaction to the ringtone.

Narration in the podcast should be short and clear. It should give only the information that the listener cannot understand from sound, such as the place, the action or the movement of a character. Too much narration may reduce the feeling of reality, while too little may confuse the listener.

Sound effects should be chosen carefully. Street noise, footsteps, the scooty engine, a mobile ringtone and park ambience are the most important elements. Each sound should have a purpose, and it should be mixed so that it supports the voices instead of covering them.

This adaptation also shows the difference between the two media. In the film, the audience sees Vishnu's expressions, but in the podcast the voice must carry the same emotion. The exercise therefore develops a better understanding of both visual storytelling and audio storytelling.

RADIO PODCAST SCRIPT APPROACH

The podcast version can begin with narration describing Vishnu walking along the street. A scooty engine approaches, followed by the sound of the snatching and the vehicle moving away. Footsteps, a stumble and Vishnu's shout communicate the chase. Each scene change can be marked by a short sound or a change in ambience so that the listener is not confused.

The story transitions to the park through ambience and Aadhi's conversation. A ringtone introduces his call. Dialogue then establishes the lift and drop-off. The phone ringtone triggers Vishnu's suspicion, leading to the confrontation.

The narrator should speak only when it is necessary to explain an action that cannot be understood from sound alone. During emotional moments, the script should allow the characters to speak for themselves, so that the audience feels close to the story.

A basic script structure can be followed. The first part introduces the street and the theft, the second part introduces Aadhi and the park, the third part presents the lift and the ringtone, and the final part presents the accusation, the police call and the apology. This structure keeps the podcast clear and gives the listener a sense of progress.

Dialogue should be written in natural spoken language. Short sentences, simple words and a few pauses are better than long explanations. For example, Vishnu's shout after the theft should be direct and emotional, and Aadhi's reply during the accusation should be calm and polite.

Sound cues should be marked clearly in the script. Each cue, such as footsteps, engine sound, phone ringtone or park ambience, should be placed beside the line where it begins. This helps the team record and edit the podcast without confusion and ensures that the timing of the sounds matches the story.

The police call reveals that the thief is Shiva. After Aadhi confirms that Shiva is his friend, a short pause can communicate Vishnu's realization before he apologizes. The podcast ends with the closing message and a moment of silence.

VOICE AND AUDIO PERFORMANCE

Voice acting is important for the podcast version because the audience depends entirely on sound to understand the emotions of the characters. Vishnu's voice can begin casually, become distressed after the theft, sound suspicious during the confrontation and become apologetic after learning the truth. Aadhi should sound natural in the park and composed when responding to the accusation.

The friend's and police voices should be brief and clear. The police voice can have a mild phone effect so that the listener understands it is a call. Each character should have a different speaking style so that the listener can identify who is speaking without any visual support.

The following elements are important:

- Clear pronunciation
- Suitable pauses
- Emotional voice modulation
- Different voices for different characters
- Controlled speaking speed
- Balanced recording levels
- Appropriate background music

Emotion should be shown through the voice in a natural way. During the theft, Vishnu can speak quickly with a slightly higher pitch. During the confrontation, his voice can become louder and firmer. At the end, the voice should become softer and slower to show regret. Aadhi's voice should remain steady, which makes the contrast between the two characters clear. Reading the script aloud several times before recording helps the actors remember the timing and avoid mistakes.

Recording should be done in a quiet place, and the microphone should be kept at a steady distance to avoid changes in volume.

PRODUCTION PROCESS

The production of the project can be divided into three stages: pre-production, production and post-production. Each stage is planned carefully so that the work remains organized and the final film matches the story.

During pre-production, the story is finalized and divided into scenes. The cast, locations, props, dialogue, shot list and sound requirements are planned. The phone-snatching and chase are rehearsed safely, and permission is arranged for public locations where required. A schedule is prepared so that all scenes can be recorded without confusion.

During production, the street and park scenes are recorded according to the shot plan. Wide, medium and close-up shots are captured to provide editing choices. Dialogue is recorded clearly, and separate ambience audio is collected where possible. Several takes are recorded for important scenes such as the chase, the confrontation and the apology.

A shot list is prepared during pre-production to save time during filming. It includes the location, the type of shot, the characters in the frame and the sound required for each scene. The list also helps the team decide the order in which scenes should be recorded, since it is often easier to shoot all scenes of one location together.

During production, the director checks performance, framing, sound and continuity after every take. If any part of the scene is unclear, it is recorded again immediately. The team also keeps backup copies of the recorded files so that no footage is lost.

In post-production, the editor first makes a rough cut, then improves timing and adds sound. After feedback, the final cut is prepared and exported in a suitable format.

During post-production, the footage is organized and assembled in story order. Continuity, dialogue clarity and pacing are checked. Sound effects, ambience and music are added, and the final film is exported after checking continuity and audio balance. The podcast version is edited separately using recorded voices and sound effects.

CHALLENGES FACED

One of the major challenges is staging the phone snatching and chase so that the action is clear and safe. Scooty movement, camera placement and the fall require careful planning. Outdoor locations may also introduce changing light, traffic noise and interruptions, which can affect the quality of the recorded video and sound.

Another challenge is making the misunderstanding believable without confusing the audience. The ringtone, scooty and Aadhi's explanation must be presented clearly. If the audience is confused at this point, the final message will lose its effect.

Dialogue recorded outdoors may need additional recording or audio cleanup, while editing must maintain continuity and make the police reveal understandable. Continuity of the phone, clothing and scooty across different shots also requires attention.

Acting is another area that needs attention. The performances should look natural, especially in the confrontation scene, where Vishnu's anger and Aadhi's calm reaction must both appear believable. Rehearsal and clear direction can help the actors understand the emotion of each moment.

Weather is also a challenge for an outdoor film. Rain, strong sunlight or wind may affect the picture and sound, so a backup plan is useful. Scenes can be rescheduled, or a nearby alternative location can be prepared in advance.

Finally, the podcast adaptation has its own challenge. The story must be understood without any visual support, so the script, voices and sound effects must work together carefully. The team must avoid too many sound effects, which may confuse the listener.

Working with limited time, equipment and locations is another difficulty. These challenges can be reduced by proper planning, rehearsal and teamwork, and they help the team learn practical problem solving during production.

LEARNING OUTCOMES

Through this project, several practical skills can be developed. The project provides experience in screenplay writing, scene planning, directing, acting, camera framing, location planning, sound recording and video editing. Each of these skills contributes to the final film.

The project also demonstrates how visual clues and dialogue can create a misunderstanding and later resolve it. It shows that a simple story can be effective when the events are arranged in a clear order and the message is not hidden by unnecessary details.

The radio podcast adaptation provides experience in narration and voice acting, and the ending emphasizes checking information before accusing someone. Working within a limited budget also improves planning and problem solving. It also teaches the value of teamwork.

The project develops observation skills. While planning shots and scenes, the team learns to notice how small details such as a ringtone, a vehicle or an expression can change the meaning of a scene. This awareness helps the team tell stories more effectively.

It also teaches the importance of pre-production. A clear script, a shot list and a schedule make filming smoother and reduce mistakes. The team understands that good planning saves time, effort and resources.

Another important learning is the value of feedback. Watching the rough cut, discussing weak points and making improvements shows how a film gradually becomes better through revision. Finally, the message of the film itself is a learning outcome, because it reminds everyone to listen, ask questions and understand the facts before forming an opinion about others.

Overall, the project develops both technical and personal skills. Technically, it improves the understanding of camera, sound and editing. Personally, it encourages patience, communication and responsibility, which are useful in any creative or professional work.

EXPECTED OUTCOME

The final outcome of the project is a short social-drama film titled “The Phone,” whose message is “Don’t Judge a Book by Its Cover,” featuring Sri Vishnu and Aadhi, with Shiva referenced but not shown on screen. The film presents a phone-snatching incident, a mistaken accusation and a clarification through a police call.

The project is expected to communicate its message through clear scene progression, believable performances and effective cinematography, lighting, sound and editing, supported by a radio podcast adaptation. It should leave the audience with a clear message.

The film is expected to be simple, realistic and easy to understand. The audience should be able to follow Vishnu’s thinking, understand why he suspects Aadhi and feel the change when the truth is revealed. The apology at the end should feel natural and sincere.

The film is also expected to give the team confidence in using basic equipment. A mobile phone or a simple camera, natural light and a small microphone can produce a good result when they are used with proper planning.

From the audience’s point of view, the expected outcome is understanding rather than shock. Viewers should leave with a simple message that they can apply in their own lives, which is to avoid quick judgments and to look for facts.

In academic terms, the project is expected to prove the student’s understanding of the film-making process, from the idea to the final edit, and of radio podcasting techniques. The report, film and podcast together show the complete learning experience of the course.

The podcast adaptation is expected to show that the same story can work in audio form. A listener should be able to understand the events, characters and message without seeing the film. Together, the film and the podcast demonstrate the practical use of visual and audio storytelling.

CONCLUSION

The project “The Phone” demonstrates how a simple everyday incident can be developed into a meaningful short film. The story begins with a phone snatching and develops into a misunderstanding when Vishnu assumes Aadhi is the thief because of the ringtone and the scooty. The police reveal that the actual thief is Shiva, Aadhi’s friend, and Vishnu apologizes.

The project combines screenplay writing, acting, cinematography, lighting, sound design and editing. The use of a limited cast and accessible locations also shows that an effective short film does not require complex resources. Each element supports the story and helps the audience understand the misunderstanding clearly.

The radio podcast adaptation shows how storytelling can be transferred from a visual medium to an audio medium. Elements that are visible in the film must be communicated through narration, dialogue, sound effects, music and silence.

Overall, the project provides practical experience in both film making and radio podcasting while emphasizing that appearances and incomplete information can lead to unfair judgments and the value of checking facts.

The story reminds the audience that everyone can make mistakes when emotions are high. What matters is the willingness to correct the mistake. Vishnu’s apology shows that honesty and responsibility can repair a misunderstanding, and Aadhi’s calm behavior shows the value of patience.

The project has also helped to understand the full process of making a film, including idea development, screenplay writing, planning, shooting, editing and audio work. It shows that a meaningful message can be presented effectively even with limited resources.
